

Waiting on the Bus: A profile of students waiting for the shuttle

There are thousands of people attending KCACTF5 and there's one thing that always stands out here. There's so much stress and frustrations with the competition. This added on top of a very odd transportation system that can range from taking 5 minutes to an hour and thirty minutes. One of these people is Max Moline who seemed to be upset about the lackluster schedule while seeming very eager to get back to his hotel. He could be quoted saying "The tensions seem to be rising immensely I expect a riot on our hands soon."

There was a lot of confusion amongst students with the shuttles and how to get around. It's important to note that the students getting to play to place is key for the convention. There were instances of buses not going to the hotel they went the day before to bus drivers going on break as soon as they dropped people off to the normandale. The most important people at the convention were getting shafted, but still kept high hopes and enjoyed the festival besides that fact. So much chaos happening from getting from point A to B and yet I've hardly seen anyone giving up and crying in a corner. The students of this convention are truly commendable for that alone.

(Transporting thousands of students around is difficult and I have complete respect for the chairs and convention leaders for setting of transportations systems and the bus drivers being thoroughly consistent.)

(Pictured at top Max Moline, who was very ecstatic to have finally returned to the hotel.)